The Fallibility of Human Judgment. When Mr. Johns Hopkins diel at Balti more at the end of 1873, he left to the upiversity and hospital which he had founded six years before, what was regarded as a magnificent endowment. According to the estimate which he had made himself and which was made by all the leading financiers of Baltimore, it amounted to more than $6,000,000 in the soundest of securities, for there were included in the bequest 17,500 shares of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad stock, and that stock was looked upon by the whole community as the safest and best of investments. As it was then seiling at near-ly 200, and yielded a net annual income of $175,000, the value of this part of the en-dowment alone was set down by all Baltimore as about $3,500,000. Hence came the chief resources of the institution. Yet now, only fifteen years after Mr. Johns Hopkins' death, the university is in so great financial difficulties that its friends are trying to raise money for its support. Instead of paying $175,000 a year, the Baltimore and Ohio stock pays nothing at all. Instead of having been a good investment, it was a very bad one; and yet he was a man noted for his business shrewdness, and nobody in Baltimore, except Mr. Garrett himself, knew more about the road and its condition. Whatever doubts he may have had as to other investments, he had none as to this; and therefore when he founded a great university to perpetuate his name, he left to it his Baltimore and Ohio shares, in the confidence that its financial prosperity was permanently se-cured. Yet at that time the railroad was not in a condition to justify any such faith in its future. The elder Garrett had a great reputation in Baltimore as a railroad man, and he was allowed to be despotic in the affairs of the company; but when the actual state of those affairs was exposed after his death, it was found that the road had suffered seriously under his undisputed mana-gement. The directors and the people of Baltimore had taken him at his own estimate of himself, and risked their money in proof of their credulity. They bought and held the stock at high prices, and those who had most faith in it were men like Mr. Johns Hopkins, who were in association with Mr. Garrett in the direction of the road. In the whole history of endowments there is nothing more remarkable than the outcome of Mr. Johns Hopkins' credulity with regard to this. Yet he was a man of extraordinary sagacity in the general man-agement of his business affairs, and because of it succeeded in accumulating one of the great American fortunes. He was a close fisted, unsentimental person, wary and suspicious, and yet he trusted the bulk of his

to posterity. No more striking proof of the fallibility of human judgement could be furnished .- N. Y. Sun. THE JACKSON STATUE.-The model, in clay, of the proposed statue in bronze, to be erected to the memory of General Stonewall Jackson, at Lexington, as heretofore stated, has been accepted by the Jackson estate to the management of a man as to whose abilities he was utterly deceived. He banked on his faith in Mr. Garrett, and even went so far as to make dependent on that faith the very existence of the university which he founded to carry his name down

Memorial Association. The model, which was designed by Edward V. Valentine, the distinguished Virginia sculptor, who designed and executed the recumbent figure of General Robert E. Lee in the mausoleum of Washington and Lee University, is two feet high, and JEWELER AND OPTICIAN. and Lee University, is two feet high, and represents Jackson at the first battle of Fredericksburg, December 13th, 1862. He is shown with bared head looking in the distance straight before him. In his right hand he holds a field glass, and rests en his sword in his left hand. The coat is buttoned close up to the throat, belted at the waist, with large loose trousers tucked in high cavalry boots. A peculiar position of the shoulders gives to the model a life like cast that has won general opinion of its trueness to life.
